You are here Dale Frost: our thinking muddies the waters By DALE FROST In some cases, thinking muddies the waters. You have heard the expression many times: "Actions speak louder than words." Not always. Sure, when politicians and other public figures have done little but talk, talk, talk, most of us begin to wonder whether they are capable of doing something. I recently heard Dr. Orson Scott Card make an interesting comment in a lecture he was giving. The talk was on a book he wrote: "Into a Dark Place," about his life growing up as a Mormon in the late 1960s. It was an interesting talk, and I didn't want to miss a word. At the end of the lecture, however, Dr. Card referenced a scene from the book and said, "It just made me wonder what I'd do if I were the villain of my own novel. Not that I'd do it, of course, but would I be able to finish it, knowing that those were my own thoughts and intentions?" Yes, I thought, knowing that cardiologist's heart muscle in mine. But there are instances when thinking doesn't muddy the waters at all. The most recent example was when "living as a question mark" was used in an opinion piece written by Iowa state Rep. Joanne Townsend. The author didn't ask, "How are we going to fix this?" But rather, "What can we do?" Those two questions — fixing and what to do — are not the same thing. Townsend was referring to her efforts to make sure state Medicaid payments were adequate to what it costs to house people who are mentally ill. (I am happy to say her efforts were successful.) The key is to not worry about fixing things and being paralyzed by possible failure. Making the things done is the only way to know whether they are the right thing to be done. Townsend used the expression: "I will be here to be the question mark." However, if we are out on the road trying to fix things, we will almost certainly make mistakes that will leave us wondering what we did wrong. In years past, it was not uncommon to hear a president, such as Lyndon Johnson, talk about "getting things done." He'd hit a button on the telephone, and his staff would be summoned to

What's New In?

By silencing the big C, we began a new stage I'm standing in a green room looking into a dark, empty audience. Normally these rooms are half-asleep and full of the ghosts and nostalgia of each week's show. But tonight, I'm lost in thought. I'm wondering how many times we'll move through this experience. Tomorrow, I'll leave this place with the whole audience laughing at my foolery. I'll drive home thinking that maybe, just maybe, I'll have a different view of my life by the time I see the ceiling. Who knows, maybe my kids will be too old to want to see their father weep when he goes out for the big showdown. There are still so many roads that go nowhere. The natural enemy of an actor is the audience. The more you speak, the more likely they are to stare at you slack-jawed and only listen half-heartedly. Yet the audience is there to listen. It's part of our job to entertain them, to captivate them, to at least give them the illusion of listening. What I have come to understand is that we can't control the audience. We can't always predict their response. Sometimes you feel the wave of laughter and hear the echo in the red curtains. Sometimes they only stare at you with great expectations. But I don't want to share my personal, ugly thoughts tonight. Tomorrow, I will have to re-adjust my world. I can tell you that I will have many more dark nights because of the decision I made earlier today. I won't share the whole story because there are still many road not taken. And I don't want my kids to be confused and wondering where I went wrong. My big brother was there tonight at the TV studio. He told me of his struggles as a young actor while we watched the big showdown. He told me that he didn't go very far down the road we're on now, but he knew it was going to take many years to get there. I'll share his story next week. For now, I want to talk about what's ahead. I want to talk about the big showdown, the final showdown. This week, my brother
